

PwC Middle East - Customs & International Trade Services

Why Customs & International Trade

Looking at how the world is changing in terms of trade behavior and international cooperation, it becomes clear that customs is shifting from a purely operational topic towards a strategic component of managing global operations.

As competition increases across the globe, greater efficiency and accuracy is expected from both suppliers and customers. At the same time, local governments have expanded and fine-tuned their trade legislation, requiring companies to also increase scrutiny of their own import, export and indirect tax (Customs and Value Added Tax - VAT) strategies to be sure that they comply with complex local laws. Not paying enough attention to these matters could cause these companies to incur unnecessary indirect tax costs, slowing their supply chains, increasing order completion time, and incurring other import and/or export risks related to non-compliance.
