

The compliance game

Every financial institution is familiar with the challenge of compliance. In order to raise awareness of the – often rapidly changing – internal and external rules and regulations, these institutions usually employ the traditional means of training courses, workshops and databases. However, these are not always effective, inspiring or stimulating.

But there is another way

Kluwer, PricewaterhouseCoopers and the innovation consultancy firm Uluru together created 'the Compliance Game'. Each of them contributed to the development of this tool with some of their specialised knowledge and experience of legal matters, compliance, education and innovation.

Learning and experiencing while at play

The Compliance Game is a computer game that allows participation by employees from business and support functions, both on their own and in teams. The participants are presented with recognisable, real-life situations and dilemmas that involve compliance with rules and regulations.

The purpose of the game is to discover the entire compliance environment together with colleagues. It allows the participants to integrate the issues of compliance in their daily work and to optimally implement the commercial aspects of compliance.

The game can be played individually and in teams made up of people with different competences against other individual participants or teams.

For every right answer participants score points both for themselves and their teams. They may 'cash in' these points at the loyalty shop.

Insight into competences and opportunities for improvement

At any moment the game allows you to call up a management report. This report presents individual scores, as well as an overview of the subjects for which participants either demonstrate sufficient competence or require further development. This information can easily translate into business risks.

Made to measure

The Compliance Game can be used for all relevant compliance subjects, such as product development, client acceptance, and advising clients. In collaboration with you, we prepare the scenarios within the game entirely to your requirements, taking your corporate culture and norms, your daily practice, your business environment and the developmental needs of your employees into account.
