

Participants were divided into six groups and had to come up with their own financial management plans. The lively atmosphere during the game made it easy for PWC staff to interact with ONIE students and offer advice on financial planning.

At the end of the first day, PWC asked participants to track their spending before the next session a week later.

It was a small but important step, said ONIE student Chaiyadej Faithong. "It was the first time I could recognize what I was paying for. I didn't even know that I had so many unnecessary costs. Finding cheaper alternatives or just not buying certain things sounds good to me now," he said.

With this partnership, PWC, UNESCO Bangkok and Bangkok ONIE were able to raise financial awareness among participants; knowledge they can hopefully share with their friends and families. Even though the scale of "How to Earn, Spend, and Save" was small, organizers and participants alike agreed that it was a good spring board for future projects aimed at increasing financial literacy among non-formal education students in the future.

©UNESCO

Participants were divided into six groups and had to come up with their own financial management plans. The lively atmosphere during the game made it easy for PWC staff to interact with ONIE students and offer advice on financial planning.

At the end of the first day, PWC asked participants to track their spending before the next session a week later.

It was a small but important step, said ONIE student Chaiyadej Faithong. "It was the first time I could recognize what I was paying for. I didn't even know that I had so many unnecessary costs. Finding cheaper alternatives or just not buying certain things sounds good to me now," he said.

With this partnership, PWC, UNESCO Bangkok and Bangkok ONIE were able to raise financial awareness among participants; knowledge they can hopefully share with their friends and families. Even though the scale of "How to Earn, Spend, and Save" was small, organizers and participants alike agreed that it was a good spring board for future projects aimed at increasing financial literacy among non-formal education students in the future.

